dwellers in trees fought with wild animals for life itself. There was the lirst hunting. They fought each other, and there was the first warfare. To fight to better advantage hey practiced the use of clubs, throwing stones, apears, and at last bows and arrows. There was the forerunner of the Greek games.

War is still the world's greatest sport. When war is at last suppressed—if it ever is—i suppose the inhabitants of the world will look back at the excitement of the "good old days" much as inhabitants of New York State will look back at the days of the Frawley law if some Governor succeeds in wiping the Governor succeeds in wiping the Frawley law off the book. Just why Freddy should expect to

Just why Freddy should expect to have an officer's commission thrust upon him by our Government is too much of a puzzle for me. His style of fighting in the ring would hardly qualify him to lead a desperate charge or to make him an idolized leader of fighting men.

Neither do I see how Freddy would "raise a regiment" in this country. He might in Wales.

If Freddy really wants to fight, why didn't he enlist in his own country? He is of English birth. He was a citizen of England, in England when the war broke out. He stayed there for some time during the war, but left shortly before conscription was adopted by the Government.
